An empirical comparison of the suitability of time of healing and time of application of a myoelectric stimulation component for the treatment of triceps surae contracture. In 32 children with spastic diplegic cerebral palsy, the suitability of time of healing and application of a myoelectric stimulation component, respectively, for muscle lengthening procedures was assessed. In a 'control' group, 'uncoiling' of the gastrocnemius was done without the use of a myoelectric stimulation component. In a 'treatment' group the gastrocnemius was lengthened by 'coiling' with the use of a myoelectric stimulation component. Based on similar reduction of passive ankle dorsiflexion, the treatment group showed a higher success rate than the control group. Furthermore, the treatment group showed a higher reduction of passive ankle dorsiflexion than the control group. These findings suggest that the time of healing of coiled muscle may be underestimated in the absence of an associated myoelectric stimulation component.
