Change in the ability of various physiological functions to resist the damaging action of oxygen radicals is an important defense against oxidative stress. Our previous studies clearly demonstrated that a high cholesterol diet (C) increases lipid peroxidation (LPO) and causes damage in several organs of rats. On the other hand, dietary antioxidants like selenium (Se) and vitamin E (VE), or the antioxidant enzyme, superoxide dismutase (SOD), decrease LPO and prevent C-induced organ damage. In this proposal, we would like to further establish the role of antioxidants and enzymes in preventing lipid peroxidation and organ damage induced by C. We would like to see how several important effects of antioxidants and/or enzymes can be studied in cultured cells. For example, we will study the effect of Se or SOD in inhibiting LPO in cultured rat liver cells, in preventing the cell damage by oxidized lipids, and in inhibiting cell proliferation. In addition, we would like to study if the damaging action of C is synergistic with effects of other chemicals which can increase LPO in cell culture. We also propose to develop a low cost semi-automated system to measure cellular LPO. This system will be incorporated in-house and will be used to measure a series of antioxidants and/or enzyme combinations which are designed to evaluate the effectiveness of LPO inhibition in the cell cultures. All of the experiments will be carried out in my group.
