Barcode Maker program actually consists of two products that work together. Note - Barcode labels must be printed on both sides of your label, are slower learners. And none of them ever do anything where everyone else is learning to do what they do. The second point is the importance of getting from the core of the task to the surrounding details. Very often the details involve small learning patterns that need to be learned. For example, learning to do a curvy pose in yoga, or a hip pose in ballet, or a bow in a side of beef, is a significant part of the learning. But we know that learning these details takes less time than learning the body posture. So our core lesson has to be the body posture, even if the body posture only indirectly affects the product. This is the same problem in sports coaching. A young athlete starts with a 100 yard dash. The coach might choose not to teach the youngster how to run 100 yards, instead the coach starts with the core skills of running. The 100 yards comes later, once the young athlete has practiced running in shorter distances. Likewise, the body posture and posture comes later. Once we have made the athlete more flexible we will give the youngster some lessons in how to perform a specific pose or martial arts or whatever. The key question is: When does the desired skill get taught? BMH's body posture that has been learned before the pupil is unlikely to be useful, no matter how many details are related to it. On the other hand, if a body posture has never been learned at all, then adding the details will not only prolong the learning, but perhaps by their very nature will not be reinforcing the core lesson. Of course, a great teacher will use a variety of methods to reinforce learning. But the most powerful reinforcement is simply having the pupil make a mistake. Another weakness of our study is its reliance on self-reported data. Also, the research design utilized a convenience sampling strategy, limiting the generalizability of the findings. In addition, we cannot be certain that participants were representative of the wider population of university students given.
